

This project has been a true challenge for me. All of the back ground literature has progressed as the study of racial profiling has only recently exploded in the United States and elsewhere. Having personal interest in racial inequality and having been involved as a victim of racial profiling, the motivation for completing this project was maintained even when data sources weren't available in the beginnings.

There are many people I would like to thank for playing key roles in my personal success as a graduate student as well as the success of this research project and it would be impossible to name all of those who played important roles. I thank my parents for their support (and funding!) of my higher educational goals. Thanks to Tammy Putmon for all of the encouragement that anyone could possibly give. Thank you to Ed Brooks for all of the assistance and true generosity. Thank you to Tiffany Chenault and Dr. Michael Herndon for the encouraging words when I thought this accomplishment was out of reach.

Last but not least, I'd like to thank my committee members: Dr. Hughes for urging me to take on the critical theory aspects, Dr. Kershaw for directing me to challenge all parts of racial inequality within the paper, and especially Dr. Bailey for who I can not thank enough. Without you, no part of this project could have been completed.
