

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The completion of this Dissertation involved the help of many people to whom I am deeply indebted. My graduate committee provided patience, critique, unfailing support, and attended many meetings. I was very fortunate to be involved with persons so committed to the betterment of our children's educational opportunity. I especially thank Drs. Richard Salmon and David Alexander. To Dr. Salmon for sharing what he described as his most compelling idea, and then honoring me with the privilege to work on it - never once suggesting that my unbridled propensity for layered analyses and prolific detail needed greater focus. Each day, every new finding brought roars of enthusiasm from him for this work - what a wonderful mentor!

To Dr. Alexander for the "gentle confrontation" in his role as a Devil's Advocate, his commitment to developing a strong, coherent argument, and his advocacy for the importance of completing this dissertation, carrots notwithstanding. He was the silent architect who designed the "creative" infrastructure that provided the time, space, and the collegiality as well as the financial resources to undertake this work. I shall always cherish such kindness.

I sincerely thank:

Dr. Jimmie Fortune for his razor sharp understanding of the mathematical and statistical intricacies and his unabashed enthusiasm for tangential thinking. Jimmie also understands a whole lot about what is important in life and how to bring balance to the research process; I will always carry that with me.

Dr. Bill Dugger, my "first" major professor, for sticking with me, smiling, and listening all these five years. He has told me to "focus" at least a dozen times. Perhaps, it has helped some. His astute understanding of the policy process outside the arena of public school finance, contributed objectivity and identified areas of potential bias to the conceptualization and refinement of the study problem;

Dr. Dick Zody for his encouragement to take the time that this study deserved and for serving as model of working on the go, and finally,

Dr. George McDowell, another enthusiastic yet confrontative spirit, who urged policy context and relevance. His willingness to help on a moment's notice has been appreciated.

I am also grateful to the non-committee members who helped me sort out aspects of the dissertation problem, its argument, and who, from time to time drained out some of the water in the "dissertative swamp." These are: Audrey Ald, Christina Dawson, Darrell Clowes, Diane Gillespie, Steve Janosik, Raymond Leonard, Sam Morgan, Bob Richards, Kusum Singh, and Jennifer Sughrue.

I acquired documents and technical assistance from several sources. The Virginia Education Association is responsible for stimulating my interest in Virginia public school fiscal capacity through their bulk mailing propensities. Specifically, Ralph Shotwell and Dixie White provided reliable data and consultation. Steve Zoiny of the Commission on Local Government, Richmond, Virginia, provided Technical Documents and telephone discussion. Harry Green of the Tennessee Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Nashville, Tennessee sent documentation and references on their unique measure of public school division fiscal capacity measurement. Carlos Elias traveled to Virginia Tech to verify and discuss the calculation methodologies. Sometimes someone can say one thing that ties together all the apparent inconsistency into some coherence. At the eleventh hour Carlos said such a thing.

For help in preparing parts of the manuscript I am indebted to Paulette Gardner. Phyllis Olinger, a true "insider," negotiated the pathfinding through the Graduate School paperless paper trail. Carmen Wisdom always shared a smile, and wondered just within hearing distance as to what type of substance composed my nerves, or had I any left? Gwen Ewing in the Graduate School always shared a smile and helped make the electronic conversion of this document less formidable.

I thank the Carroll County (Virginia) School Board for educational leave for the 1996-97 school year and the Virginia Tech Department of Educational Administration for a Graduate Assistantship. For the opportunity to present these ideas before an audience as they were developing I thank the Virginia Education Association, the Virginia Association of School Business Officials, and the Virginia Educational Research Association.

I thank my mother, Barbara Green, and my parents-in-law, Walter and Ruth Driscoll, for their support. It has been said that, "life happens to you, while you're doing other things." I am exceedingly grateful to my husband Patrick, and our children, Julie and Forrest, for their understanding, love, and "all the other things" throughout this endeavor.
