

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The researcher wishes to express her appreciation to those whose cooperation and assistance made this dissertation possible.

Very special gratitude is due to Dr. Harold Stubblefield, the writer's major advisor and chairman of her dissertation committee. His support and encouragement was freely given from the early beginnings of my research through the many drafts to the final result. His knowledge and skill in historical research as well as his skill in guiding the organization of the massive amount of materials was invaluable. Appreciation is also extended to the other members of the dissertation committee, Dr. Norris Bell, Dr. Marcie Boucouvalas, Dr. Robert Hawkes and Dr. Albert Wiswell. They have long held the writer's respect, admiration and friendship as colleagues in university teaching and administration and as fellow members of adult education associations. Dr. Boucouvalas, especially, deserves much gratitude for her prodding the writer to continue toward the goal and for assistance in the many administrative hurdles faced. Dr. Bell's diligence in reading every word of every chapter and making both substantive and editorial comments strengthened this dissertation. Dr. Hawkes and Dr. Wiswell asked penetrating questions and made valuable suggestions to guide the work. Deepest thanks is extended to them all.

Gratitude is also due the staff members of the Manuscripts Department of the Lilly Library at Indiana University and the staff of the Reading and Manuscripts Departments of the Library of Congress who aided in the location of specific materials and in the use of the facilities and equipment. Of inestimable benefit was the complete freedom given the writer in the use of the Overstreets' Personal Files and the opportunity to know and have countless conversations with the Overstreets over many years.

Finally, the writer expresses the deepest appreciation to her husband, Norman, and her children, Michael and his wife Nicole; Laura; Hilary and her husband Martin; Stephen and Jocelyn and her grandchildren Pauline, Virgile, and Jacob. It was the patience, support, and love they gave unceasingly while maintaining a rich sense of humor that enabled the completion of this project.
