Kimberly:

No, the survey questions are copyrighted by me. But I can grant you a copyright release if you wish. I would only ask that you credit me in your survey cover letter and dissertation and that you share the final results of the research with me.

But I would urge you to look at the fourth edition of this book, which just came out.

I would also recommend that you have a look at my articles on technical succession planning. It may be relevant to your research. See copies of the articles attached.

More recently I have published a book about the manager's daily role in developing talent. The title of that book is The Manager's guide to maximizing employee potential (2010).

You are right. The copyright attaches the moment the work is created. It is not published in any official work, just a handout. But your certainly have my permission to use it.

Closer and closer.

Quoting Kim Carlson <KimCarlson2009@gmail.com>:

Steve, I'm editing my final chapter of my dissertation and I would like to use part of the paper that I wrote for your class because it helps my implications argument... this paper includes your policy matrix. Did you ever publish this matrix or was it just a handout in your class? If you never published it, then you own the permission to use the matrix, correct? Would you be willing to give me permission to use it? Attached is DRAFT copy of my final chapter for you to see how I am using it (I'm still editing it, so ignore the comments and editing remarks). Please let me know if you have any questions. Best, Kim
