I was born in a small town called Bokaro in the eastern part of India, where I lived till I was 13. Then we moved to a town called Visakhapatnam on the south-east coast of India. Through my childhood, I was a wild enthusiast of the game of Cricket, and dreamt of playing for the Indian Cricket Team. However, it was not to be. It so happened that I came to the United States, a country where Cricket is an unknown game. Hence, I had to banish the cricketing thoughts from my mind and, instead, I began the pursuit of my Masters degree in Mechanical Engineering at Virginia Tech.

While doing my masters thesis at Virginia Tech, I became interested in distributed computing and Web technology. After graduating from Virginia Tech, I accepted an offer as a Software Engineer with IMAKE Software and Services, where I am involved in developing software for Internet applications.
