

Entomological Society of America Copyright Permission

<http://www.entsoc.org/pubs/publish/copyright>

Except for materials prepared as a result of employment by the U.S. Government and Canadian Government, all material published by ESA is copyrighted and protected under U.S. copyright law. Under the Copyright Act of 1976, the term of copyright for materials registered by an organization is 75 years from the date of first publication. Before publishing any manuscript, ESA requires authors to complete a copyright transfer form as part of the ESA Publishing Agreement. Authors of materials published by ESA must transfer full and complete ownership of any copyright to ESA. ESA then registers the copyright.

Materials published by ESA may not be published elsewhere without prior written consent of ESA. Requests for permission to reproduce published materials should state where and how the material will be used. Requests should be addressed to:

Dear Director of Publications,

The research for the article:

Vieira, L. C., McAvoy, T. J., Chantos, J., Lamb, A. B., Salom, S. M. & Kok, L. T. (2011) Host Range of Laricobius osakensis (Coleoptera: Derodontidae), A New Biological Control Agent of Hemlock Woolly Adelgid (Hemiptera: Adelgidae). Environmental Entomology 40(2): 324-332.

Was conducted as part of my PhD research. I would like to ask for written permission to use it in my thesis.

Thank you,
Ligia Cota Vieira

Elsevier Copyright Permission

<http://www.elsevier.com/authors/author-rights-and-responsibilities#rights>

Rights & responsibilities

At Elsevier, we request transfers of copyright, or in some cases exclusive rights, from our journal authors in order to ensure that we have the rights necessary for the proper administration of electronic rights and online dissemination of journal articles. Authors and their employers retain (or are granted/transferred back) significant scholarly rights in their work. We take seriously our responsibility as the steward of the online record to ensure the integrity of scholarly works and the sustainability of journal business models, and we actively monitor and pursue unauthorized and unsubscribed uses and re-distribution (for subscription models).

In addition to authors' scholarly rights, authors have certain responsibilities for their work, particularly in connection with publishing ethics issues.

As a journal author, you have rights for a large range of uses of your article, including use by your employing institute or company. These rights can be exercised without the need to obtain specific permission.

How authors can use their own journal articles

Authors publishing in Elsevier journals have wide rights to use their works for teaching and scholarly purposes without needing to seek permission.
