

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Throughout his entire (and at times, seemingly endless) process, there have been many people who have offered their thoughts, insights, and comments. I am initially thankful for Scott Johnson, without whose guidance, encouragement, and belief that this is a worthwhile endeavor, this study might never have been realized. Mark Benson, Alison Galway, Layne Prest, and Jim Hightower, the other members of my committee, have been unwavering supporters of this work as well. During my time at Virginia Tech, I am especially thankful for the wisdom of Kimberly Flemke, Jennifer Sparks, Dawn Viers, and Stephanie Walsh, four people whom I consider extremely fortunate to count as colleagues and friends.

Others have contributed to this study as well. Jim Hightower, in his role of Executive Director, and Susan Cooley, Director of Clinical Services, and the rest of the staff of the McFarland Institute/Pastoral Counseling Center in New Orleans, Louisiana, taught me during my internship year what it meant to be “blessed”. There are three others whose presence will always remain with me: my fellow interns Laurin Stennis, Anamaria Villamarin, and Kelly Wiebe.

I would not be at this threshold of my life were it not for the love and support of my wife Maria, who has been my partner throughout this entire journey. During the thin places, where one begins to doubt almost everything, she was there to provide support in whatever direction I took. If there are such things as miracles, she is living proof that they occur on a daily basis.
