

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would very much like to thank the faculty and staff of the Department of Urban Affairs and Planning for their professional treatment of me as more of a colleague than a student. In particular, I would like to thank John Randolph, my dissertation chair and friend, for his support, understanding, and encouragement throughout this process. I would not have been able to attain my goals without his guidance.

I would also like to thank the members of my committee -- Richard Rich, Timothy Luke, Judith Mayer, and James Bohland -- for their "open door" policies. They have always been available to discuss this project and, at various times, have helped point me in a more productive direction.

Finally, and most importantly, I would like to thank my wife, Jeanne, and my children, Katy, Michelle, John, and Molly. Jeanne carried the economic load of supporting a family of six while I indulged my fantasies of further academic study and blamed it on a mid-life crisis. And how can I ever justify this to the kids who were forced to give up a middle class existence to be unwitting accomplices of my return to the existence of a starving graduate student.
